THE GAVEL REVIEWS A MYRIAD OF THIS SUMMER’S BIGGEST BLOCKBUSTER MOVIES SEE PAGE 3
CSU’S PRODUCTION OF SARTRE’S NO EXIT SEE PAGE 5
OFFICE OF CAREER PLANNING PROVIDES IDEAS AND OPPORTUNITIES FOR STUDENT NETWORKING SEE PAGE 5
SCHOLARSHIPS FOR BAR EXAM PREP COURSES SEE PAGE 7
THE GAVEL INTERVIEWS CASSANDRA COLIER-WILLIAMS SEE PAGE 6

Cleveland-Marshall hosts moving, informative Cyberbullying Symposium

By Kelly Albin
GAVEL CONTRIBUTOR

On Friday, September 23, 2011, the Journal of Law and Health hosted a Cyberbullying CLE Event to educate the Cleveland community about cyberbullying’s negative effects on adolescent mental health and the need for cyberbullying legislation in Ohio. According to the Cyberbullying Research Center, cyberbullying is defined as “willful and repeated harm inflicted through the use of computers, cell phones, and other electronic devices.” A nationwide rise in cyberbullying-induced teen suicide has compelled forty-two states to pass specific cyberbullying laws or to amend state bullying statutes to include electronic harassment scenarios. Ohio is not exempt from the recent nationwide trend of cyberbullying-induced teen suicide. Currently, Ohio has no law that seems to fit a cyberbullying-type scenario.

Cynthia Logan began the event by sharing her daughter Jessica’s tragic experience with cyberbullying. A nude photo of Jessica was reportedly sent to her boyfriend, and the image soon went viral to four high schools. Jessica’s peers became extremely abusive. Although the local resource officer, school officials, and the district attorney were aware of the bullying, each said they could not help Jessica, and the abuse intensified. After nearly a year of relentless taunts and torments, Cynthia’s eighteen-year-old daughter took her own life.

State Senator Joe Schiavoni followed Cynthia’s presentation by discussing Senate Bill 127, the “Jessica Logan Act.” The pending bill requires school

Introducing Dean Craig M. Boise: The Gavel gets a Q&A

By Gelise Littlejohn
GAVEL STAFF

GL: Describe yourself in three words.
CB: Empathetic, determined, energetic.

What did you want to be when you were in grade school?
A rancher. I grew up in a farming, ranching community.

What is the most important piece of information you learned in school?
Actually, it was something that my Dad told me. ‘Your judgment is no better than your information.’ You can’t make good decisions if you don’t have information.

What is your personal mission statement?
Never stop growing.

Is there anything you know now that you wish you would’ve known while in law school?
Things turned out okay, I don’t look back and have a lot of regrets. [laughs] Maybe how long it takes to pay back school loans.

Who has impacted you most in your career?
I couldn’t say one person. Several different people have been influential at different points in my career.

What advice do you have for 1Ls?
Try to get a sense of the big picture of what you are learning in your classes. The details can be very overwhelming and there will be great demands on your time, but find out how to spend the time in order to perform well on law school exams.

What advice do you have for 2Ls?
Take the courses that you find intriguing or interesting. Use your second year to expand your intellectual horizons.

SEE BOISE PAGE 2

What advice do you have for JRs?

You really need to be honing the skills that it takes to be a lawyer, to actually work as a lawyer; that is negotiation, problem-solving, working in groups, networking, and being able to work a room in a social setting.

What attracted you to Cleveland-Marshall?

What really attracted me to this place was the urban mission, similar to that of DePaul in Chicago where I was director of tax programs. The students were sometimes the first in their families to have attended college, much less graduate school. They may have struggled, but they were hustlers and hard workers without a sense of entitlement. There’s an energy about this school that is pretty exciting.

What are your top three goals for Cleveland-Marshall?

My top three goals for our school are far to be ranked one of the top three schools in Ohio. I also want our faculty to be recognized nationally for their scholarship, and for 100 percent of our students to pass the bar and be employed.

What job search tips do you have for our students?

One of the difficulties of getting a job is lack of experience. Utilize externships and clinics. These are engagement experiences that can be helpful in getting a job.

What is your most proud achievement thus far?

I would say being a good father to my kids—they tell me that I am. Professionally, being Dean here is my proudest achievement. I’m happier to be doing this job than anything else right now.

South Africa’s Justice Goldstone Visits Cleveland-Marshall: A Reaction

By Sara E. Tackett

When South Africa transitioned from apartheid to a constitutional democracy, the nation’s leaders were charged with the task of creating a new Constitutional Court. The Court’s first task was to review and determine the constitutionality of the country’s newly drafted Constitution, which included an expansive Bill of Rights. President Nelson Mandela appointed Richard J. Goldstone to the new Court. During his lecture, Justice Goldstone discussed the challenges faced by the new Court in ruling on issues that trouble our own Supreme Court over two hundred years after its creation, such as cases involving the constitutionality of the death penalty and crimes sexual orientation.

The most memorable components of Justice Goldstone’s presentation revolved around his own bemusement with the situation South Africa had created for itself with apartheid. He spoke with genuine perplexity as to how the white minority, totaling a mere twenty percent of South Africa’s population, could have repressed the overwhelming majority of black South Africans for so many years. His tone betrayed only slightly what I perceived as disappointed acceptance of the fact that the apartheid ended only for pragmatic and not moral reasons. He also appeared to speak with slight condescension of the descriptions of the end of South African apartheid as peaceful, as thousands more died after the end of apartheid had been officially, or politically, declared. His worst contempt, however, seemed reserved for the fact that the constitution-forming process nearly broke down negotiations entirely between white and black South Africans. Specifically intriguing about his commentary was the white South African call for a Bill of Rights requiring fundamental human rights once they had begun to feel the full weight of their minority status.

I appreciated Justice Goldstone’s humor in recounting how the first two trials he was presented with as a Justice were the constitutionality of the Constitution of South Africa, and the constitutionality of the death penalty, two subjects that still seem to plague American jurisprudence centuries after the forming of its Constitution. Equally as unexpected was the Justice’s comparisons of South African policies regarding human and civil rights with those of several powerful nations; perhaps it is a result of my own bias as a disgruntled liberal American, but I detected a slightly over-proud tone in the Justice’s lecture when comparing South African’s triumphs establishing the legitimacy of the South African Supreme Court’s legitimacy and the nation’s populace and gay and lesbian rights with the struggles of the high courts in Germany and the United States, respectively.

While South Africa seemed to have studied diligently the history books when forming its government, judiciary, and policies, Justice Goldstone may have been implying the United States do the same.

Overall, I found Justice Goldstone’s presentation to be a brief history lesson in the creation of governments as well as an overview of the creation of South Africa’s first national Constitution. I enjoyed hearing him speak and look forward to watching the South African government’s progression as issues such as South Africa’s constitutionalized affirmative action measures become increasingly complex.

A video of Justice Goldstone’s presentation is posted on CM Law’s website.

Among his many honors, Justice Goldstone served as the first judge of the Supreme Court of South Africa and was appointed a judge of the Constitutional Court in 1994, remaining on the court until 2003. Among his many honors, Justice Goldstone is the recipient of the MacArthur Award for International Justice, the International Human Rights Award of the American Bar Association, and Honorary Doctorates of Law from universities around the globe. Since 2004, Justice Goldstone has taught as a visiting professor of law at several American law schools, including Harvard Law School, New York University School of Law, Fordham University School of Law, and Georgetown Law School.

We look will be looking for new writers for the current school year!

Interested in being an Editor-in-Chief? Contact the Gavel staff at gavel.csu@gmail.com.

Cleveland-Marshall College of Law
Cleveland State University
(216) 687-4533 Telephone
(216) 687-6881 Fax
Gavel@Law.CSUOHIO.EDU

Co-Editors-in-Chief
Jessica Fredette
David Nichols
Sara Tackett

Gavel Staff
Anonymous L.
Kevin Garceau
Gelise T. Littlejohn

Gavel Contributors
Kelly Albin
Michael Muha

Advisor
Thomas Buckley

Printer
PM Graphics

All rights revert to author.
This Summer at the Movies! A Film Review for Fellow Students

David Nichols
Co-Editor-in-Chief

The Beaver
THUMBS UP!

There is a lot to not like about Mel Gibson. I mean, well, let’s not even get me started on that list. And his films are usually so awful. So The Beaver was a pleasant surprise for me. Gibson plays a suburban dad on the edge of a nervous breakdown who finds a therapeutic oasis by living his life as his own hand-puppet. He does a sort of Mr. Garrison from South Park, if you will. The film focuses on the reactions of his immediate family, who, you quickly learn as the movie rolls along, have enough problems as it is. The screenplay was ridiculous, of course, and unapologetically, bizarre. To be honest, I was a little freaked out, which made it thrilling. It’s worth the squinting, but don’t bring a date to it.

Midnight in Paris

THUMBS UP!

Woody Allen is kind of a big deal. He still seems to be having as good of a time writing and producing his films currently as he did in the old days. Owen Wilson plays a novice novelist visiting Paris with his pretentious friends, while Wilson wants to shop and hang out with her pretentious friends, whereas Allen’s character wants to go to bars and party with his friends. This is one of those flicks where someone throws a rock at a car and it explodes on impact. Second, the James Bond guy throws a rock at a car and it explodes on impact. That’s all I need to say about this film.

Harry Potter and the Etc. Etc.

THUMBS DOWN!

Forget what you heard about how epic this film was supposed to be. In the end, it was just The Lord of the Rings without weapons. Lots of discontinuities and tons of scenes where a group of people are clapping for one another. And, of course, it was in 3D, which, as we learned in Cowboys and Aliens, is a major foreshadowing that the movie you’re about to watch will be unimaginably stupid. Another problem was how complex all the magic was. I read all the books and have seen all the movies, and was still scratching my head at some of the specifics: How many horcruxes are left, again? How does the magic stone work? Aren’t these people dead? Wait, Ron speaks Parseltongue? It’s bad enough we have to remember the acoustic soundtrack which features the film successfully captured the incomprehensible nature of romance and the unintentional harms that arise from misunderstanding a loved one. A very good film.

Pirates of the Caribbean: On Stranger Tides

THUMBS DOWN!

I was hugely into the epic two-part sequel of the original Pirates series. As much as Johnny Depp gets sugar-coated by the press and teenage girls, it’s impossible to just not like Captain Sparrow. He’s America’s first drunken pirate hero! So when I heard they made another one without Orlando Bloom and Keira Knightley, I was a happy guy. Both of them are unforgivably lame actors. Unfortunately, the film was an unexciting let down nonetheless. The plot was stupid, it was in 3D, there were no big ocean battles, and Depp stopped selling his character midway through. I’ve practically forgotten the plot: weren’t they looking for some buried thing? Who cares.

Cowboys vs Aliens

THUMBS DOWN!

With a title like this, I couldn’t resist blowing my $11 of lunch money one afternoon. I put on the flowy glasses, chewed popcorn, and spent a couple of hours watching Harrison Ford curse at aliens. Although I admit I had a good time, I don’t recommend you see the film. First, it’s utterly implausible. It’s one of those flicks where someone throws a rock at a car and it explodes on impact. Second, the James Bond guy makes a boring cowboy. He’s way too British. Third, aliens! Really? I mean, what are a group of cowboys and Indians going to do to fight off aliens? Use gunpowder? Arrows? These people came from outer space, they have lasers and George Bush-era biochemical weaponry! You’d have to watch it for yourself, but you really shouldn’t. Fourth, I have a problem with how everyone in action flicks knows kung-fu now. Was this always the case? Before The Matrix, did action stars have automatic karate skills like they do now? I’m not sure, but again, you’ll just have to see for yourself. But you probably shouldn’t.

Sarah’s Key

THUMBS UP!

For some reason, I walked into the Cedar Lee theatre unaware that this film had to do with the Holocaust. If you’re like me, such a film requires some emotional preparation. Be ready. In this movie, a hip French journalist is writing about the Vel’Hoffa Roundup during World War II. In her research, she realizes that her family, like many French families, was connected to these tragedies through a series of historic events. The film also spends some time capturing the traumatic effects of the tragedies on a young girl separated from her little brother and sent to Auschwitz by the French police. Basically, if you have a soul, you’re at the edge of your seat throughout the entire film with a napkin in your eye. The story is truly intense, but don’t forget that the photography is also excellent. And likewise, Kristen Scott-Thomas, in case you didn’t know, is outstanding. I greatly recommend you check out this film. And the book, for that matter.

Rise of the Planet of the Apes

THUMBS DOWN!

I was a fan of the original series. Being a pessimist, I wasn’t completely looking forward to see how our generation would further ruin it with this follow-up to the recent Planet of the Apes. All the reviews I read raved about its special effects! Lie! Everything in the film is so obviously obnoxiously digitized. If you’ve watched your roommate play Xnox, then you know what I mean. It was basically a poor-man’s Pixar. The film’s main action comes when a talking chimpanzee leads a rebellion against a city’s monkey prison. (Right?) So these apes go absolutely nuts and wreak havoc all over San Francisco when the prison staff treats them harshly. Maybe I’m making it sound more awesome than it was. Trust me, when it comes to the dollar theatre, don’t waste your buck. This movie was corny, unrealistic, and boring. I hope that none of the actors have successful careers after this.

The Tree of Life

THUMBS UP!

The best review I read about this film was a 5-star rating with only this simple remark: “Just go with it.” I’m the type of nerd who thinks the films of Malick can cure someone’s cancer, so my opinion’s mostly one-dimensional. This film was indescribable. Where most folks may not enjoy it when a director pauses the script and spends 15 minutes showing the universe create itself in a visual operatic montage, I saw beauty and indescribable. Where most folks may not enjoy it when a director pauses the script and spends 15 minutes showing the universe create itself in a visual operatic montage, I saw and enjoyed it. So basically, bring on the complex weirdness, is my vote! If you can watch 2001: A Space Odyssey in an afternoon without coffee, then you can probably handle this. Enjoy the ride, nonlinear LSD flashbacks that spiral up this scarily ambitious film. Or, you should just go with it.

One of my favorite films all summer! Submarine is about an alienated adolescent lit-geek from Wales in the 80s who has a crush on his classmate, Jordana. She’s too cool for him and won’t show him the light of day until she sees schoolyard bullies beat him up for refusing to insult them. They begin an awkward relationship, but things predictably go wrong when Jordana is affected by her mother’s failing health. At the other end of the spectrum, the kid’s own parents are having their own ins-and-outs when the mother’s ex-boyfriend, a new-age self-help lecturer, moves in next door. Arctic Monkeys did the soundtrack which features outstanding cinematography and screen-dialogue. Overall, the film successfully captured the incomprehensible nature of romance and the unintentional harms that arise from misunderstanding a loved one. A very good film.

One of my favorite films all summer! Submarine is about an alienated adolescent lit-geek from Wales in the 80s who has a crush on his classmate, Jordana. She’s too cool for him and won’t show him the light of day until she sees schoolyard bullies beat him up for refusing to insult them. They begin an awkward relationship, but things predictably go wrong when Jordana is affected by her mother’s failing health. At the other end of the spectrum, the kid’s own parents are having their own ins-and-outs when the mother’s ex-boyfriend, a new-age self-help lecturer, moves in next door. Arctic Monkeys did the soundtrack which features outstanding cinematography and screen-dialogue. Overall, the film successfully captured the incomprehensible nature of romance and the unintentional harms that arise from misunderstanding a loved one. A very good film.
This issue’s Alumni Spotlight was given to Attorney Cassandra Collier-Williams. Her story is unique because it is a testament to several questions about her extensive career as a lawyer that we felt would be relevant to current Cleveland-Marshall students.

Born in Springfield, Ohio, Ms. Collier-Williams knew she was going to become an attorney since high school. After graduating from Cleveland-Marshall College of Law, she worked as a mediator for the City of Cleveland Prosecutor’s Office and later for a private law firm for 10 years. In 1999, Ms. Collier-Williams decided to strike out on her own and establish her own practice. That year, she began her own law firm, using her house as the initial headquarters in order to stay close to her two sons. After a growing success, Ms. Collier-Williams established an office downtown, providing services throughout Ohio, and hired a staff of reputable attorneys in the area.

Ms. Collier-Williams has also mentored a multitude of Cleveland-Marshall students and contributed to panel discussions and conferences facilitated by the school.

For some, the debate over Arizona Senate Bill 1070 is simply a matter of a state’s right to enforce a law that the federal government isn’t enforcing. For others, it is an attempt to subvert federal law and deport undocumented workers. The high courts have said that making it a criminal act for an undocumented immigrant to be present in Arizona. It would also allow law enforcement officials to ask the person being detained to show their documentation, during a traffic stop, detention, or arrest. The law enforcement official could only do this, if he had reasonable suspicion that the individual was in the country illegally. A federal judge granted an injunction on July 28, 2010, that prevented the Arizona law from going into effect.

The International Law Students Association (ILSA), the Hispanic Law Students Association (HLSA), and the Federalist Society sponsored the September 22 program. It featured Robert Alt of the Heritage Foundation, Adjunct CMLaw Professor David Leopold, and local immigration attorney Tom Gilbert.

During the program, Robert Alt stated that an argument of those who are opposed to Senate Bill 1070 is that it is a racist bill that targets Latino’s. Alt stated that this contention is unwarranted because it repeatedly states in the bill (four times) that officers are not allowed to consider race when determining whether to inquire about immigration status.

Alt added that the core issue in the debate over Senate Bill 1070 is whether it preempts already-existing federal law. Alt said that there is no problem with local officers checking immigration papers, and courts in most circuits have upheld the act. Also said that legislators have allowed local officers to do so.

“Congress has encouraged state enforcement of federal immigration laws,” Alt said. Adjunct Professor David Leopold strongly disagreed with Alt. Professor Leopold said that people who have an immigration-anti-agenda wrote the bill.

“Lest you have any doubt about what the authors of this disgusting piece of legislation are after, they are after one specific racial group—Hispanics,” Leopold said.

Leopold also said that the bill preempts federal law because it criminalizes being an undocumented worker, which the federal government has not done. He also argued that this bill would put a tremendous burden on local law enforcement and federal immigration officials because of the constant verification of individuals’ documentation.

Arizona Governor Jan Brewer announced in May that she plans to ask the United States Supreme Court to review Senate Bill 1070, but the court has not yet announced whether it will do so.

A gavel Co-editor-in-Chief
Alumni Spotlight: Introducing Cassandra Collier-Williams
By David Nichols
GAVEL CO-EDITOR-IN-CHIEF

By Kevin Garvah
GAVEL CONTRIBUTOR

A debate arises within our borders.

What do you enjoy most about being an attorney?

I say: Work hard and love what you do. If there is something you hate doing, you can find someplace else in the field that caters more to your interests. Legal work is dynamic that way and there are enough areas to accommodate whatever you feel comfortable doing. For instance, if you really like speaking, you can be a trial lawyer. If you really like numbers, there’s tax law. There are positions in the field for almost any talent.

What are some of the differences between working for a firm and managing your own firm?

The most significant difference is that when you are managing your own firm, the buck stops with you. When you are working at a big firm, there are usually partners and associates that you have the responsibility to report to. It doesn’t work that way when you’re by yourself. With your own firm, cases are not just assigned to you; instead, you have your hands in everything. Also, starting a law firm is very difficult financially. It takes courage, especially if you are just out of law school. In that case, you don’t receive the mentorship you would usually get from having experienced attorneys in your office.

What do you look for when you are hiring an attorney at your firm?

You have to be able to write. You should always have a good writing sample with your resume. If an applicant cannot write well, they are in trouble. Research skills are also important. And a sound work ethic. People who can perform the most without breaking stride will be successful. I also look for attorneys who are able to adapt to different types of cases. These days, an applicant’s flexibility is a great virtue.

You have been involved with our alumni association, BLSA, and other organizations affiliated with the University, and you have been a regular attendee at Cleveland-Marshall. Why do you think activities like these are important?

As an attorney, I feel that you really have to give back. Acting as a mentor has always been very important to me. I like to help law students especially. I often hire them as clerks to assist lawyers in the office. Clerking experience is so essential. Students have to be able to get some advice when they need. I try to teach them what I can.

Any future goals?

Everyone has to have a next step; otherwise you may begin to feel stagnant. I feel the next step in my career is to become a judge and continue helping the people that way. Judges have important positions in that their decisions directly impact the community and touch many lives. I see a judicial career as a method of giving back to the community.

Do you have any time management advice?

That’s it. You just have to manage your time. That comes with the job. Sometimes you just have to get up early or put in some late hours in the office. I’m also meticulous about plotting everything out on my calendar. Keep in mind though, that you don’t have to give up your hobbies. Similarly, you can still have a family and be a lawyer. It just takes working and planning. I’m a believer that there is enough time in the day to have it all.
I Heartre Sartre: A student reviews CSU’s production of “No Exit”

By David Nichols

On October 6, I got a chance to check out the opening production of Cleveland State University’s “No Exit” by Jean-Paul Sartre. The play was performed on campus at the Factory Theatre and presented by the Department of Theatre and Dance and directed by Scott Spence, a professor at CSU, and long time Artistic Director of the Beck Center in Lakewood. Spence, I recently discovered, has been named “Best Director of 2011” by Cleveland Scene Magazine. It also featured a small enthusiastic cast of young students.

Before the play began, we were reminded of the announcement that CSU’s Facotry Theatre will no longer be hosting University sponsored plays after November. Although Michael Maudlin, the chairperson of the Department reported that it had found a new home at the newly renovated and much esteemed Allen Theatre, there’s something to miss about the small, post-industrial venue with its cracked walls and scratchy acoustics. The Factory Theatre, you must admit, still embodies the underground quality embedded into much of Cleveland’s art scene and will not quickly be forgotten. For the more sentimental of us, CSU will be hosting it’s last “Factory” play, “The Tempest,” at the old venue. The Tempest, coincidentally Shakespeare’s famous “farewell” play, will is set for production mid-November.

As a philosophy student, I had attended multiple productions by Sartre, the existentialist philosopher, novelist and playwright. “No Exit,” his most famous play is often considered to be one of the great masterpieces of twentieth century theatre. I often recall the anti-social mantra Sartre made famous: “Hell is other people!”

The set was appropriately dark and looked like the parlor of a drab Dickensian abode. Before and during the play, the ticking of a grandfather’s clock tickled our ears. The actors wore mid-century dress and tightly powdered faces; their hair was oiled, their eyes outlined in black. The cast appeared almost ghostly. Everything went together to accessorize the hell envisioned by the author.

The play features three main characters and a bell-hop. The latter is an employee of the Kafka-esque hotel that is the allegorical afterlife. The play chronicles a conversation between three people who had died from various causes and were forced to share a room. The characters are utterly complex and very challenging for young actors. The students cast in the roles did an impressive job and seem to have more than a mild understanding of the existential symbolism behind some of the absurd banter. They were even able to deliver the laughs from the audience during some of Sartre’s more sarcastic dialogue, a trick that I have seen fail on other stages.

All together, I much recommend that you see it for yourself. Bring friends. Or family. After curtain, I could hear several students in the audience whispering to their grandparents and little sisters what they had learned in history or literature classes about the implications of French Occupation during World War II and it’s reflection on modern thought. Or that suffering, for Sartre, did not bloom from “other people” in a childish sense, but from the consciousness in contradiction with the freedom of expression inherent in individual existence (a condition Sartre calls “in-authenticity”) or “bad faith.”

The play’s additional themes of feminism, ethics and psychology serve to inspire intense conversation among comedrades, whether you “heartre Sartre” (a friend’s recent facebook status) or heart debate regarding the human condition. The play is running until the middle of October.

Office of Career Planning to provide networking opportunities

The Office of Career Planning is off to a very busy start for the 2011-2012 academic year. We are very lucky to have two talented new additions to our staff – Francie Fields and Kristen Rutter. Francie and Kristen both come to us with law career planning experience. Francie came from CBWI and Kristen from John Marshall in Chicago. They both have a wealth of ideas, connections, and advice that will greatly benefit our students. In addition to the day-to-day student counseling, Francie and Kristen will be working closely with student organizations to provide assistance with career related programming and resources.

To bring you up to date, the Fall Interview Program is coming to a close, and we are pleased to tell you that 40 employers recruited either on-campus or through resume collections during the program. We are very encouraged by this number, as it, as well as the number of overall interviews, is up from last year. As you hopefully know, this is just the beginning. Interviewing for all types of positions both legal and non-traditional will continue throughout the year. Already this semester, we have had several programs. Our judicial clerkship roundtable for 3Ls considering any position both legal and non-traditional, and Small Firm Task Force kickoff event.

The Office of Career Planning is in a panel and individual discussions with their organization. The list will continue throughout the fall and spring terms. Remember, the key to a successful job search is to network as much as possible while you are in law school. Every person you encounter while in law school – be it through CMLAW programs, a bar association program, or through your community or organizations you may belong to – has the potential to be an important part of your job search. NETWORK, NETWORK, NETWORK! And then follow up and stay in touch with the people you meet.

We look forward to working with you this year!!
Suicide Prevention: join the fight and save a life

By Michael T. Muha
Gavel Contributor

On September 25, 2000, I attempted suicide due to the incessant bullying and harassment I received as a high school student in Western Pennsylvania. 11 years later, after a Bachelors Degree from Slippery Rock University of Pennsylvania and a Masters Degree from The American University, I am in my last semester at Cleveland-Marshall. Thanks to the support from my family, I’m quite lucky to be alive today. I wish I could say the same for the too many high school students who are committing suicide across our fine country.

The Fall Cyberbullying Symposium sponsored by the Journal of Law and Health and the Health Law Society reiterated the harsh reality that there are adolescents and young adults taking their own lives due to terrible bullying occurring in their schools. I wish the Symposium didn’t have to take place, but something must be done to save those who desperately need our love, support, and understanding.

As someone who has suffered from the intense pain and suffering of mental illness and suicidal ideation, I empathize with adolescents like Mentor High School student Sladjana Vidovics, who committed suicide after being teased for not speaking English well after coming to America from Serbia at a young age. Or Jamey Rodemoyer, who committed suicide after being called a “faggot” by his peers.

I kept my suicide attempt quiet for nearly eight years through college and graduate school until the suicide of my cousin on May 25, 2008, who died just three months before my start as a 1L at Cleveland-Marshall. His death affected me so much that I became a suicide prevention advocate. On May 11, 2011, I went public with my struggle with bullying, mental illness, and suicide, giving a speech to the students of Hickory High School, my alma mater in Hermitage, Pennsylvania, a small town 15 minutes east of Youngstown, Ohio. My speech opened the door for many Hickory High students to seek help. The response from the students and some of my former teachers was inspiring. In turn, that response has given me the courage to tell more people about my story in hopes that I can help more students desperately looking for solace from mental illnesses like depression and bi-polar disorder.

Now, as I conclude my law school experience at C-M Law, I will continue my fight against bullying in schools and suicide prevention. For the past three years, I have raised money for the Suicide Prevention Education Alliance, Northeast Ohio’s suicide prevention organization, which is dedicated to suicide prevention education of high school students in Northeast Ohio. SPEA institutes a program that serves 102 Northeast Ohio schools and more than 80,000 students. This program tries to cause at-risk students to seek and receive treatment for their mental illness. SPEA provides information to students so that they can also help other students if they spot the warning signs commonly associated with mental illness and suicide.

SPEA is solely funded through donations and it needs more in order to adequately and successfully reach students. All donations are tax deductible and 100 percent of donations go directly to SPEA programming. If you wish to donate, you can visit my personal fundraising page at personalfundraising.kintera.org/michaeltmuha.

We must shine a light on mental illness and suicide and stop the stigma paralyzing our young people from speaking out and getting help. There are too many children and adolescents taking their own lives and we, as a society, must do something to help. I’m fighting for the Jessica Logans, Jamey Rodemoyers, and Sladjana Vidovics of the world. Join me.
BULLYING
CONTINUED FROM PAGE 1
bullying policies to specifically address cyberbullying that occurs in and out of school. “School administrators often feel handicapped in their ability to prevent a student from being bullied if the incident doesn’t happen on school grounds,” Senator Schiavoni stated. He willingly admitted that the bill is still a work in progress because of the First Amendment implications of permitting schools to regulate off-campus student speech. The Senator stated that he purposely introduced an incomplete bill to raise cyberbullying awareness among Ohio legislators, while continuing to iron out the details. “We as a state got to make a move on it before it gets worse,” Senator Schiavoni stated. Senator Schiavoni sought feedback about the bill from attendees, which included lawyers, educators, and public health officials.

Tim Boehnlein, Education Director of the Cleveland Domestic Violence and Child Advocacy Center focused on the clinical aspects of cyberbullying. “Cyberbullies are often encouraged by the ability to hurt somebody anonymously, and also tend to be anxious socially with a lack of empathy,” Boehnlein said. He explained the differences between traditional, face-to-face bullying, and cyberbullying, where bullies can hide behind a computer screen. “Sometimes they aren’t even aware that a simple click of a mouse on a computer can do such harm.”

Boehnlein introduced Johanna Orozco, a Teen Educator for the Domestic Violence and Child Advocacy Center. Orozco experienced the violent extremes of cyberbullying scenarios and has turned tragedy into triumph. After being in an abusive relationship for two years, she had the courage to leave her abuser—a decision that almost took her life. Shortly after leaving him, her former boyfriend sexually assaulted her and later shot her in the face with a sawed-off shotgun. Orozco’s spirit, confidence, and carefree outlook inspired the hearts of many attendees. Through testimony in the Ohio Legislature, Johanna was instrumental in passing laws that allow teens to obtain protective orders and mandate teen dating violence education for all students in grades 7-12. Boehnlein shared with the audience that Orozco was recently asked to appear on ABC’s “The View” with Vice President Biden to share her story. David Frattare, Lead Investigator for the local Internet Crimes Against Children Task Force, concluded the event by discussing Ohio’s current laws that are ill-fit to prosecute cyberbullies. He also offered tips for parents, educators, and teens. Frattare encouraged educators to thoroughly investigate complaints brought to their attention and to make a record of any cell phone messages reported by a student. He emphasized the importance of standing up to a student cyberbully. “One of the most productive ways to stop cyberbullying,” Frattare explained, “is to acknowledge the incident and address it immediately.”

The Journal of Law and Health will publish a Student Note in its next issue that discusses cyberbullying’s effect on adolescent mental health, the inadequacy of Ohio law, and issues that criminalizes the more extreme cases of cyberbullying. Look for the next issue of the journal to be released sometime in December.

With over 200 attendees, the Journal event proved a success to inform local lawyers, educators, and public health officials on cyberbullying’s nationwide prevalence. As Cynthia Logan stressed, “Our children are dying and no one is taking note in our state. This epidemic is preventable. It must stop. We are all responsible for the well-being and safety of our school age students, whether they are entering kindergarten or a senior in high school. We have an obligation, a duty, to protect our young citizens.” The Journal would like to thank everyone who attended and helped plan this wonderful event.

Scholarships available for Bar Review courses

Mary McKenna
DIRECTOR, LAW ALUMNI ASSOCIATION

The C|M|Law Alumni Association Bar Exams Scholarship Fund was established in 2009 to air worthy the CM|LAW students, in politics, law and public health. Each scholarship is a work in progress because of the First Amendment implications of permitting schools to regulate off-campus student speech. The Senator stated that he purposely introduced an incomplete bill to raise cyberbullying awareness among Ohio legislators, while continuing to iron out the details. “We as a state got to make a move on it before it gets worse,” Senator Schiavoni stated. Senator Schiavoni sought feedback about the bill from attendees, which included lawyers, educators, and public health officials.

Tim Boehnlein, Education Director of the Cleveland Domestic Violence and Child Advocacy Center focused on the clinical aspects of cyberbullying. “Cyberbullies are often encouraged by the ability to hurt somebody anonymously, and also tend to be anxious socially with a lack of empathy,” Boehnlein said. He explained the differences between traditional, face-to-face bullying, and cyberbullying, where bullies can hide behind a computer screen. “Sometimes they aren’t even aware that a simple click of a mouse on a computer can do such harm.”

Boehnlein introduced Johanna Orozco, a Teen Educator for the Domestic Violence and Child Advocacy Center. Orozco experienced the violent extremes of cyberbullying scenarios and has turned tragedy into triumph. After being in an abusive relationship for two years, she had the courage to leave her abuser—a decision that almost took her life. Shortly after leaving him, her former boyfriend sexually assaulted her and later shot her in the face with a sawed-off shotgun. Orozco’s spirit, confidence, and carefree outlook inspired the hearts of many attendees. Through testimony in the Ohio Legislature, Johanna was instrumental in passing laws that allow teens to obtain protective orders and mandate teen dating violence education for all students in grades 7-12. Boehnlein shared with the audience that Orozco was recently asked to appear on ABC’s “The View” with Vice President Biden to share her story. David Frattare, Lead Investigator for the local Internet Crimes Against Children Task Force, concluded the event by discussing Ohio’s current laws that are ill-fit to prosecute cyberbullies. He also offered tips for parents, educators, and teens. Frattare encouraged educators to thoroughly investigate complaints brought to their attention and to make a record of any cell phone messages reported by a student. He emphasized the importance of standing up to a student cyberbully. “One of the most productive ways to stop cyberbullying,” Frattare explained, “is to acknowledge the incident and address it immediately.”

The Journal of Law and Health will publish a Student Note in its next issue that discusses cyberbullying’s effect on adolescent mental health, the inadequacy of Ohio law, and issues that criminalizes the more extreme cases of cyberbullying. Look for the next issue of the journal to be released sometime in December.

With over 200 attendees, the Journal event proved a success to inform local lawyers, educators, and public health officials on cyberbullying’s nationwide prevalence. As Cynthia Logan stressed, “Our children are dying and no one is taking note in our state. This epidemic is preventable. It must stop. We are all responsible for the well-being and safety of our school age students, whether they are entering kindergarten or a senior in high school. We have an obligation, a duty, to protect our young citizens.” The Journal would like to thank everyone who attended and helped plan this wonderful event.
Are you taking the November MPRE? (Multistate Professional Responsibility Exam)

Attend a LIVE MPRE Lecture
right here at Cleveland-Marshall

When: Saturday, October 29, 2011, 9:00 AM – 1:00 PM

Where: Cleveland-Marshall College of Law, Room # 11

Program includes FREE:
- complete MPRE outline
- coffee & donuts

This event is FREE and open to all law students - No registration required -

Sponsored by Delta Theta Phi
Law Fraternity
and

SUPREME BAR REVIEW

MPRE Review book
Revised Edition
This comprehensive program includes:
- Complete MPRE subject outline
- Over 200 MPRE practice questions with explanatory answers
- Free access to our online MPRE video lecture

MPRE iPhone app
Available from Apple iTunes Store
Key Features include:
- Video lecture (no Wi-Fi or 3G connection required after initial download)
- Practice multiple-choice questions with explanatory answers
- E-mail and telephone support within the app

Toll-free: (866) BAR-PREP
SupremeBarReview.com