Make America Great Again

Several key aspects of Donald Trump's "Make America Great Again" campaign combined to facilitate his Electoral College victory

• Social Media
  Trump's controversial yet strategic use of social media caused the size of his audience to skyrocket (and at little to no monetary expense to him or his campaign)

• Populist movement
  Trump's policy positions were better suited to appeal to an increasingly popular Populist movement

• Campaign Trail
  Trump held considerably more rallies in key swing states than did his opponent Hillary Clinton

Strong Policies and Mixed Enthusiasm

Donald Trump won not only because of the strength of his policy positions, but also because of the weaknesses of his opponent, Hillary Clinton. The Trump campaign's gravitational pull of those on the outskirts of the political arena contributed greatly to him winning the presidency.

Trump's policies appealed to those who had lost influence in the Post-Cold War era. There were some studies that predicted Trump's win through economic dissatisfaction due to mergers and acquisitions, globalization and automation. In addition, a majority of white, non-college graduate voters voted for Trump because they thought that the national economy was in a poor state and that illegal immigrants should be deported back to their own countries (CNN 2016).

A large factor in Clinton's loss was that she was a weak candidate. In one study, 61% of drop-off voters (those who only vote during presidential elections) decided not to vote ahead of time. Their reasons included statements such as "I did not like either candidate", "I think both candidates were not a good fit for president" and that "Neither candidate was trustworthy." (Global Strategy Group, and Garin Hart Yang).

How Diversity Affected the Outcome

Diversity produces different social outcomes depending on the level of diversity in a given area. At an integrated local level, people of all races generally become more tolerant of each other as their misconceptions of other races are dispelled.1 But at the same time, diversity on a larger scale with limited positive contact between races produces the opposite effect: among all races, tolerance goes down and racial resentment increases as the perceived social and economic “threats” from other races increase.2

The social identity theory3 of party identification postulates that people choose their party based on the social groups (e.g. racial, religious, etc) they believe are associated with each party.4 Race has consistently been found to be one of the innately dominant social identity group5, and the Democratic party's adoption of a platform based on civil rights for minorities in 1948 essentially solidified support among minorities for the Democratic party.6

Consequently, public perception of the Democratic Party is generally that it is the party of minorities.7 Under conditions where diversity has driven racial resentment up, the Democratic Party’s minority-centered public image is driving white voters away and, in many cases, to the Republican party, which the public generally perceives as the non-minority, or white, party.8
