The Cauldron, 2015, Issue 13

Elissa L. Tennant
Cleveland State University

Abraham Kurp
Cleveland State University, a.k.krup@vikes.csuohio.edu

Abby Burton
Cleveland State University, a.k.burton@vikes.csuohio.edu

Morgan E. Elswick
Cleveland State University, m.elswick@vikes.csuohio.edu

Follow this and additional works at: https://engagedscholarship.csuohio.edu/cauldron_archives

Part of the Arts and Humanities Commons, and the Communication Commons

How does access to this work benefit you? Let us know!

Recommended Citation

https://engagedscholarship.csuohio.edu/cauldron_archives/13
THE PROBLEM WITH INTERNSHIPS
PAYING FOR EXPERIENCE
RESUME

OP: CSU feels the 'Bern'

Extended winter break
Business building damaged
What’s brewing this week

Bernie Sanders rally
Democratic presidential candidate Bernie Sanders held a rally at the Wolstein Center Nov. 16 to gather support for his "political revolution." P3

CSU wins home opener
CSU’s men’s basketball defeated Malone University 62-42 in CSU’s home opener Nov. 17. P6

"Almost, Maine"
CSU’s Department of Theatre and Dance put on a workshop production of "Almost, Maine" Friday, Nov. 20 and Saturday, Nov. 21. P10

Staff
Editor-in-Chief
Elissa Tennant
Managing Editor
Abe Kurp
News Editor
Abby Burton
Arts & Entertainment Editor
Morgan Elswick
Sports Editor
Gregory Kula
Opinion Editor
Sara Liptak
Cover Designer
Steven Pitingolo
Web Editor
Francesca Gariano
Advertising Manager
Sarah George
Business Manager
Giorgiana Lascu
Faculty Advisor
Dr. Edward Horowitz
Distribution
Mark Heller

Staff Writers & Photographers
Amara Alberto, Lisa Hammond, Matthew Johns, Roman Macharoni, Dan McCarthy, Becky Raspe, Megan Sheldon, Cameron Tolbert, Elisabeth Weems, Patrick Kaminowski

Contact The Cauldron at cauldroneditors@gmail.com
For letter to the editor submission guidelines, visit www.csucauldron.com.

Weekly Calendar

Nov. 24 to Nov. 30

Tues » Nov. 24
- CSU Roller Sports Club Meeting, SC 340, 3 p.m.
- Wrestling vs. OSU, Woodling Gym, 7 p.m.
- Zumba With the Deltas, RC 152, 7 p.m.

Wed » Nov. 25
- Viking Expeditions Toy Drive, SC Innerlink, 9 a.m.
- Creative Writing Workshop, RT 109, 1 p.m.

Thurs » Nov. 26
- Thanksgiving Day
- Start of Thanksgiving Break

Fri » Nov. 27
- Thanksgiving Break

Sat » Nov. 28
- Thanksgiving Break

Sun » Nov. 29
- The Turkey Jam, Wolstein Center, 7 p.m.

Mon » Nov. 30
- CSU Theater Auditions, MB 519, 6 p.m.

Want your event featured on our calendar? Send the event name, date, time and location to cauldroneditors@gmail.com. Submission deadline is every Saturday prior to the event by 5 p.m.
Democratic presidential candidate Bernie Sanders made a stop at the Wolstein Center at Cleveland State University Nov. 16 to speak and campaign for the upcoming 2016 election.

A packed crowd of CSU students — along with Case Western Reserve University students and Cleveland-area personnel — attended the event.

Junior Erica Kilroy, a Promotional Communication major with a Public Relations focus, was one of thousands of supporters at the rally.

"I'm just excited to see the unity that we can have on campus with the Cleveland people," she said. "He's supporting affordable tuition for state schools — and I think it is really important to start our greatest generation on the right foot."

"Now is not the time for cheap political talk," he said. "Now is the time...to unite the world in an organized campaign against ISIS."

Along with the terrorist attacks, Sanders mentioned President Bush and the casualties on both sides stemming from the Iraq War. He said this new fight against ISIS will not be like the old wars.

"We are gonna be tough, but not stupid," he said. "Know that the United States of America must not be involved in perpetual warfare in the Middle East."

Sanders then touched on issues ranging from women’s rights to ageism to the definition of “family values.”

Sanders also spoke out against the high incarceration rate in the US and talked about spending this money on education and jobs instead. He pointed out the youth unemployment rate in the country that the government should be fixing.

"For high school graduates... between the ages of 17 and 20 for white kids, real unemployment and underemployment is 33 percent," he said. "For Hispanic kids [it is] 36 percent. For African American kids [it is] 51 percent."

Sanders said the jobs in the country are too sparse and the the jobs that exist do not provide sufficient wages.

"The wages in America are too damn low," he said.

To fix these low numbers and the poor healthcare system in the United States, Sanders is currently helping to push through legislation that will allow three months of paid family and medical leave.

Sanders then moved back to foreign policy and trade and voiced his disapproval with NAFTA and other foreign trade systems. Instead, he wants the country to invest in U.S. workers and ideas.

"The wages in America are too damn low."

He believes that the banking system is the center of this change and that the Glass-Steagall Act should be reenacted to ensure the banks’ activity is limited.

"My view is if a financial institution is too big, it is too big to exist," he said. Sanders also talked about his legislation to take marijuana off the banned substances list. He views this as a way to bring down the number of incarcerated individuals.

Overall, Sanders brought forth a campaign that focuses on a government designed to work for people instead of for businesses and for special interest groups.

Applause followed almost every key point that Sanders made about his policies.

Sanders may be behind Hilary Clinton in the Democratic polls, but with a long campaign still ahead, he wants everyone to remember that his campaign is being funded without the help of a Super-PAC.

"Our campaign is a people’s campaign," Sanders said. "Please join the political revolution."
Winter break extended one week this year
Weekday classes to resume after MLK Jr. Day, later than usual

By Dan McCarthy

While students may complain about having to go to school the Wednesday before Thanksgiving this fall semester, an unusually long vacation from classes is fast approaching.

Spring semester for Cleveland State University students starts a full week later than other area universities with classes suspended until Jan. 16.

This means most students will not resume their coursework until the week of Jan 18.

The first day back, Jan. 18, is a federal holiday — Martin Luther King, Jr. Day — meaning students start the semester with a break from classes that effectively extends winter recess until Jan 19.

This excludes students taking Saturday classes, who are expected to resume classes Jan. 16.

During the Fall 2014 semester, final exams finished Dec. 13, similar to the schedule for this Fall semester when final exams will extend until Dec. 12.

However, the first weekday class for the Spring semester during the 2014-2015 academic year began Jan. 12. Indeed, winter break was one week shorter last year than this year.

Community colleges around the area coincide with Cleveland State’s scheduling. Lorain County Community College(LCCC), Cuyahoga Community College (Tri-C) and Lakeland Community College all begin Spring semester classes the week of Jan. 18.

CSU students and community college students interviewed were surprised to learn they would be out of school until MLK Jr. Day, and were generally pleased by the information.

Caroline Sweeney, a senior Social Work major at CSU, was surprised and excited to hear about the length of break.

Sweeney is looking forward to the extra time that she won't have to worry about classes and schoolwork.

Giorgi DeVito, an undeclared first year Tri-C student, says she is looking forward to the additional week off.

DeVito plans to use the week to take a trip, noting the less expensive airfare due to decreased demand after the holidays.

Abbey Clark, a sophomore student who has taken credits at both CSU and LCCC, is content to have the extended break but is less impacted by the semester’s start date. Clark takes her classes online.

Local private universities vary from the area publics. Case Western Reserve University begins its spring semester Jan. 11.

Baldwin Wallace University, and University Circle’s Cleveland Institute of Art also start their Spring semesters a week prior to CSU.

John Carroll University and Ursuline College both share a Jan. 19 start date with CSU.

Nearby, Notre Dame College — in the city of South Euclid — though, follows other privates, starting its spring semester the week of Jan. 11.

CSU students can expect to see winter recess extend to MLK Jr. Day for quite a while. According to the 2016-2017 academic calendar, this change will be around for at least another year.

Professors speak out on course evaluations

By Khadijah Smith

As the semester comes to an end, Cleveland State University students are reminded by the university emails and instructors to take their course evaluations.

Course evaluations are a way for students to anonymously give feedback to and about instructors.

Anup Kumar, a Journalism and Promotional Communication professor, is a big proponent of course evaluations

“I often tell students that they should do the evaluations because that feedback will be helpful,” he said.

“It will help the instructors and others make things better and address concerns.”

Not only do these evaluations help the instructors of the course, they are also helpful for future students who will take those courses.

“It is a feedback and you are doing it to help the other students who are going to come into the class,” Kumar said.

Jeffery Bolt, a college lecturer in the school of Communications at CSU uses the evaluations in many ways.

"Course evaluations allow us to alter or adapt our teaching methods."

Although these evaluations are highly important to instructors and future students of that course, they are often pushed aside by some students.

The university switched from in-class evaluations to online course evaluations this year, Bolt said because of this change, the number of students taking these evaluations has dropped.

“These new electronic resources get sent directly to the student to do on their own through an email. Our completion rates are not that high,” he said.

Due to this lack of online participation, some professors offer extra credit to students who take them, and some professors have their students take these evaluations in class as a whole, such as Bolt.

“I want a good representative sample,” he said. “These ideas of allowing class time [to fill out evaluations] is a way to hopefully increase that completion rate.”

Although some students may feel their feedback is not going to make a difference, Kumar assures them that it will.

“When we get the feedback we do learn from it, we see what’s working, what’s not working, what needs to be done,” he said.

Course evaluations come every semester, and it is important for students to give their feedback on instructors and courses, according to these CSU professors.

“Everyone needs to fill them out simply because it’s trying to get the consensus of the whole class,” Bolt said.
CSU holds 10th International Education Day

Students from all cultures celebrate in Student Center Atrium

By Patrick Kaminowski

The Cleveland State University Student Center Atrium was looking festive this past Wednesday, Nov. 18 when students, staff and volunteers gathered to celebrate International Education Day.

The event was put together by the Center for International Services and Programs (CISP) at CSU, and driven by student groups.

CISP has been operating at CSU since 1996. The program's various staff members and student workers have been organizing the annual International Education Day (IED) for ten years now as a part of International Education Week (IEW).

Harlan L. Smith, director of CISP, said that IEW has been condensed into a single-day event at CSU.

IED is different at other campuses around the state. Smith said that at some campuses, things are more centered within the educational departments and feature lectures and guest speakers.

According to Smith, the goals of IED at CSU are community building and sharing. The students who participate are culturally linked to many places around the world.

"It's all about trying to make CSU a welcoming place. It's our community saying 'welcome' again."

Smith said the event has doubled in size and cost in the last two years. He feels that it works so well because it's student driven and feeds off of great organizational energy.

Attendees of the event had the opportunity to try various foods from several cultural backgrounds including samples from Palestine, Lebanon, Hungary and many other cultures.

The food set ups are primarily funded by the Student Government Association and CISP. Smith encourages registered student groups to add their desired set up to the event as well.

Student organizations set up tables under rows of flags from different countries to celebrate IED. They provided information on their heritage to interested guests.

The day featured many musical performances by students of various ethnicities.

Among the many performances, the Arab Student Union performed a Dabkeh Dance and the Chinese Culture club did a vocal performance.

TJ. Hayes, a junior Theatre major who performed a song from "Les Miserables" sung in Hebrew, was very happy to be a part of the event.

Shabreese Murphy, a CISP staff member, enjoyed the great sense of pride that was shown at the event. She said that she was glad students of different backgrounds could happily display the things that tie them to their roots.

"It exposes the American students to other cultures," she said.

Murphy also noted she was impressed by how smoothly things went.

"I enjoyed this event," Murphy said. "But the kids who attended are what made it more exciting and enjoyable."

Business building damaged by high winds

By Elissa Tennant

Business students received an evening off when classes were cancelled last Wednesday, Nov. 18 after high winds damaged the skylight of the Monte Ahuja College of Business.

According to John Soeder, senior writer for University Marketing, walking pavers had been placed on the roof to ensure workers performing inspections and maintenance would be able to move around safely.

Around 2:45 p.m., high winds moved the walking pavers around, causing them to collide with the glass of the skylight, which was damaged but remained intact.

No injuries were reported, but within five minutes after the incident occurred, students received a campus-wide alert informing them the business building was being evacuated and would remain closed until further notice.

Security guards were placed at all building entrances.

Soeder said the building was evacuated and closed out of an "abundance of caution."

Shortly after, university officials conducted a safety assessment and necessary repairs were made to the skylight. Further repairs to the area will be completed within the next few weeks.

Around 6:45 p.m., another notification was sent to students stating the building would reopen for all scheduled classes on Thursday, Nov. 19.

Soeder said the incident was unique. Damage to campus buildings is usually a result of water and heavy rain. The university has worked to combat water damage over the past ten years by replacing most of its roofs to stop leaks.

CSU has no concern over the stability of its buildings and has secured the business building roof to ensure no further incidents occur in the near future.
Basketball impresses in home opener
Vikings take over second half to beat Malone University 62-46

By Matthew Johns

The Cleveland State University men’s basketball team won its first home game of the season on Tuesday, Nov. 17 at the Wolstein Center.

The Vikings took down Malone University by a score of 62-46 to move to 1-1 on the season.

CSU won the opening tip-off and went on to score the first points of the contest courtesy of senior forward Vinny Zollo.

CSU was able to draw a number of early fouls and control the tempo against Malone (2-1). Although the Vikings were having offensive struggles early on, their defense was able to pick up the slack.

CSU’s defense played in a man-to-man and full court press for most of the first half, forcing seven turnovers.

Five minutes into the game, CSU held a small 7-3 lead, but the momentum began to shift. The CSU offense never got going in the first half.

While the game plan seemed simplistic, the Vikings seemed to take it to heart, controlling the second half.

Waters and Zollo believe this change happened halfway through the second half and carried until the end of the game.

“I think the change was around the 11:00 mark,” Zollo said. “We got a groove going.”

That groove would allow CSU to take over the game.

Before this Vikes snapped into it, Malone continued to control the pace in the beginning of the second half. They would build a 29-24 lead within the first five minutes, but a steal by junior guard Andre Yates followed by a dunk by Zollo would finally swing the momentum in CSU’s favor.

The Vikings scored 11 unanswered points to mount a 35-29 lead with 13 minutes to go in the game. Back-to-back three-pointers by sophomore guard Terrell Hales and freshman forward Jeron Rogers allowed CSU to keep the momentum.

CSU made 48 percent of their field goals in the second half while holding Malone to just 28 percent. The Vikings also made 57 percent of their three-point attempts in the second half, while Malone did not make one.

The Vikings led by as many as 18 and would go on to win by a final score of 62-46.

“Our nemesis right now is our offense,” Waters said. “Today, Demonte [Flannigan] stepped forward, but we want improvement.”

Junior forward Flannigan would finish the game with a game high 22 points, 17 rebounds and two blocks, his first career double-double.

Flannigan made nine of 12 field goals en route to his big game. These number were surprising, because he was only making his second career start.

The Vikings defense held Malone to 31 percent on field goals and had 27 defensive rebounds, but Waters feels his unit can be better.

“We need to improve defensively,” he said. “Our defense needs to carry us. We need to get consistency out of our guards. I believe that if you have good guards, they can carry the team.

CSU certainly has a bright future, as two of their five starters are sophomores and ten of the 17 men are underclassmen.

“Having a new unit is good,” Zollo said. “A large part of our success will come from our veterans. We do a good job. We’ve done a better job of getting everyone involved.”

12 players — veterans and newbies — saw playing time against Malone, which is something Waters said he wants to do more.

Waters was very happy that his team was able to win the home opener, but Malone is a Division II university and CSU has a long way to go to compete in the Horizon League.

CSU is now 43-42 all-time in home openers. Waters said he is looking forward to this season and for a lot of improvement from his young roster.

“I think we are going to surprise some people once we figure the offensive side out,” Waters said.

The men’s basketball team moved to 1-2 with a loss Saturday, Nov. 21 against Rhode Island University. The Vikings were outscored 73-45 in the first game of their four-game Cancun Challenge. Freshman guard Rob Edwards led the Vikings with 16 points and five rebounds.

CSU senior forward Vinny Zollo grabs a pass during a disappointing first half against Malone that saw the Vikings down at halftime.
The Cleveland Cavaliers are now 10-3 as of Saturday, Nov. 21. Will this be good enough for a championship? Their biggest rivals and last year’s National Basketball Association’s (NBA) champion, San Francisco’s Golden State Warriors, currently sit at a perfect 14-0.

Personally, I think once everyone is healthy on the Cavs, they will be able to push hard enough to — at the very least — meet the Warriors once again in the NBA Finals. The Cavs have started the 2015-2016 season strong. They demolished the Atlanta Hawks, who the Cavaliers faced in the playoffs last season, Saturday, Nov. 21 with a final score of 109-97.

With guard Mo Williams and center Timofey Mozgov both out — along with Kyrie Irving and Iman Shumpert out recovering from long-term injuries — this game didn’t look too promising to me, but I was happily surprised. This win shows that each player has prepared enough to be ready for their time to shine. Not to mention guard J.R. Smith is finally coming back to his old self — minus some bad publicity.

Williams has also been a key part in the Cavalier’s strength this season, usually scoring around five points under forward Lebron James. I have a theory about Williams. While Irving is out recovering, I think that Williams is using this time to show head coach David Blatt that when Irving gets back, he shouldn’t be benched. However, Williams may have pushed himself a little too hard because he has been out the last two games due to inflammation in his right ankle, according to SB Nation.

The Cavaliers are facing some struggles right now as far as injuries, but once everyone is healed up, it should be a very interesting season. I predict that our starting lineup in about eight weeks will be James, forward Kevin Love, Irving, Mozgov and Williams.

While this starting lineup alone is daunting to opponents, I think our bench players are what make us an even scarier team. Our starting lineup in about eight weeks will be James, Love, Irving, Mozgov and Williams.

Our starting lineup in about eight weeks will be James, Love, Irving, Mozgov and Williams.

Players like guard — and living legend — Matthew Dellavedova, forward Tristan Thompson, guard Iman Shumpert, Smith, forward James Jones and center Anderson Varejão are just some of the talented players waiting to shine on the Cavalier’s bench.

Although facing the Warriors will be challenging, Most Valuable Player Stephen Curry will be the biggest obstacle. Curry is averaging 33.6 points per game this season and is known for his ability to handle a basketball better than most NBA players today. He does not hide his drive to be a repeat NBA champion and MVP.

While he seems almost unstoppable, our team has a skillful lineup of players ready to give it all that they’ve got and give Curry a run for his money.

The Cavs look much improved since the series against the Warriors last year, and all they need now is to get healthy and stay healthy.

If you want to see the Cavaliers in action over Thanksgiving break, they play Nov. 25 at the Toronto Raptors, Nov. 27 at the Charlotte Hornets and Nov. 28 at home against the New Jersey Nets.

You can’t be disappointed with the lineup of current All-Stars and some future Hall of Famers. Cavs basketball will be playing well into summer this year, so get a head start on watching them.

By Abby Burton

Photo by Abby Burton

Left: The Cavaliers offense jostles for a rebound during their win against the Utah Jazz Nov. 10 at Quicken Loans Arena.

Right: The Cavs, including forward LeBron James, have to look out for reigning MVP Stephen Curry (number 30) and the Golden State Warriors in their quest for a title.

Stephan Curry will be the biggest obstacle... averaging 33.6 points per game this season.
The problem with internships
Paying for experience

By Elissa Tennant

(Ed. Note — This article is in response to a story published in The Cauldron Sept. 29 about internships on campus. Though that story only explored student experiences while finding and working in internships, we’ve come to realize there’s much more to say on the topic. This story is meant to serve as a follow-up to the original piece.)

It’s 2015 and students can no longer land their dream job straight out of college with just a 4.0 and a smile. It’s all about the experience.

This is not lost at Cleveland State University, where students are encouraged by both faculty and curriculum to graduate with documented practical experience.

But according to many, internship programs at CSU are sticky when you put them under the microscope. Students and administration alike have recognized some definite faults in the system and — slowly but surely — they’re working to fix the worst ones.

The problems

Student Government Association (SGA) President and senior Health Sciences major Emily Halasah is a member of an SGA committee designed specifically to tackle student issues with internships. She and her team have identified three main areas where internships are not quite working.

First, if a college or program requires a student to finish an internship for academic credit, they should help the student find the position.

Second, if the internship is a credit hour requirement but has no academic component and no support from CSU, students should not be charged full price for the credit hour requirement.

And third, the process of getting students into internship opportunities is often unorganized and should be streamlined through a centralized department or university official.

Halasah witnessed some of these faults firsthand during her work as a summer intern with Medical Mutual for her College of Science and Health Professions capstone requirement.

According to Halasah, every graduating senior in the College of Science is required to complete a capstone course.

"[The capstone course] can be an internship or it can be a class where you write this really detailed, 25-page research paper," she said. "A lot of students in that college are opting toward the class because it’s hard to find [an internship] if the college isn’t helping you."

Though many students are opting for the class and paper instead of the practical experience, Halasah went the internship route for her capstone. To qualify for the academic credit, her position at Medical Mutual was accompanied by an online course component run through CSU. The course was based on discussion boards and taught students professional skills that they could apply in the workplace.

But Halasah didn’t see the point of paying CSU for the course while she worked at Medical Mutual.

"You shouldn’t have to pay three credit hours for a professor to do minimal work," she said. "There’s nothing to grade when you’re in that class. It’s a discussion post."

Halasah said she doesn’t just want a better reason to pay for the credit hours. She wants CSU to step up and improve the quality and organization of its internship offerings.

"If I’m going to pay, I want [CSU] to find my internship [and] I want [CSU] to place me there."

"If I’m going to pay, I want [CSU] to find my internship [and] I want [CSU] to place me there," she said.

Tim Russo, a graduate student in the Masters of Global Arts and Integration (MAGI) two-year program, voiced similar concerns regarding the cost of internships.

Russo is required to complete an internship to graduate from his program but said he had no support from the MAGI program in finding a position. He is currently interning without pay for a friend of his who owns a private law firm. He is paying for three hours of academic credit without earning a paycheck.

"This is grotesque," he said. "You’re making us work for free, doing nothing to help us get it and charging us for the privilege. I have no problem being forced to do an internship to graduate, but the money thing makes me sick to my stomach."

While Halasah and SGA have identified three common problems students have with internships on a wide scale, many departments have their own unique and specific struggles.

Senior Operations and Supply Chain Management (OSCM) major Dana Smith was going to CSU as a Finance major in the University Scholars Program in the summer of 2014 when she discovered, applied for and received an internship with the Cleveland Foundation without any assistance from the university.

Smith worked in the prestigious Cleveland Foundation summer internship program as an operations intern for Gay Games 9, held in August 2014 in Cleveland.

She planned to count the position as her required internship for the Scholars program curriculum. However, she was informed by the department her internship would not count toward her degree because it was an operations internship unrelated to her Finance major. When she switched to an OSCM major some months later, she was then told it was too late for her to add the internship for credit.

This disconnect between the department and the student meant Smith has technically never officially finished an internship.

"What I found was that I had this wonderful internship opportunity, but I didn’t really get any school credit for it,” she said. “It didn’t count toward my graduation [and] didn’t really mean anything in the eyes of Cleveland State, which was frustrating. I’m without an internship in the eyes of Cleveland State.”

Fortunately, Smith dropped out of the Scholars Program and changed her major. She is no longer required to have an internship to graduate.

If she had not done so, she would risk delaying graduation until she either found a new internship or worked out an agreement with the Scholars program and the Finance department to ensure her internship counted for credit.

The solutions

Dr. Peter Meiksins, vice provost for Academic Affairs, convened a faculty-led committee last year to respond to internship complaints. The committee consists of members from Career Services, the Registrar’s Office, Financial Aid, International Offices and representatives from each college.

The group met once last year and twice (so far) this year to tackle criticisms of CSU’s practical experience programs. They are working to propose solutions to bring to the Faculty Senate.

The committee chose to begin by defining exactly what an internship is — this way they can determine which practical experiences should be assigned required credit.

Traditionally, Meiksins said he viewed internships as a course for credit where students would find an internship, work with a faculty member on an academic component of the experience and count it for credit.

However, he realized not every “internship” requirement in the course catalog follows this definition.

“Where I’m hearing complaints is where students find themselves in a field placement and basically what they’re doing is either paid or unpaid work, and then there’s no faculty member,” Meiksins said. “There’s no faculty member who’s your supervisor and you’re not interacting with them, there’s no academic work, there’s no learning of an academic sort. So you’re getting credit — but for what?”

The practical idea would seem to be declaring that any internship with an academic component requires credit.

However, Meiksins said having internships with academic credit associated with them can get even more complicated. How does administration define an academic component? What work should count toward a degree and what shouldn’t?

"This is grotesque. You're making us work for free, doing nothing to help us get it and charging us for the privilege."

The committee is also working more specifically on areas similar to the problems identified by Halasah and SGA — charging students for internship credit, helping students find positions and creating a centralized internship headquarters on campus.

Instead of charging students for internship credit, Meiksins said he would prefer to add a third, non-credit option for internship requirements where an internship is required as a sort of “check-box” at no cost to the student.

“In other words, you can have an academic credit internship, you can have a co-op or you can have a credit-free ‘practical experience,’” he said.

Meiksins also believes it is in each department’s best interest to help its students find internships, especially when they’re required to graduate.

The student can benefit from an internship search — it mimics a real-world job search — but to facilitate the process, he said, it is best to identify a coordinator for each college or program whose job it is to connect students with practical experience opportunities.

Meiksins said a coordinator for each college is better than a centralized internship department or person because internships need to be academically meaningful. Internships are often capstone requirements, the culmination of a student’s degree, and it’s important that students work with career experts in their field of study rather than blindly asking a central hub for opportunities that best fit them, according to Meiksins.

However, not every college has a coordinator to facilitate the internship or co-op process. Each college has either a tightly run internship coordination program, zero coordination program or a disjointed program running somewhere in the middle — there is no university-wide consistency or university-wide, centralized coordinator.

The closest thing CSU has to a centralized internship coordinator is Career Services — they handle internship requests from employers and work to bring internships to the students.

Any employer with job or internship openings will come to Career Services, who will then send the positions off to the respective colleges to pass on to students. Career Services also uses its online Career Connections system to organize student résumés and job opportunities.

Unless a student’s résumé is in the system, they cannot be considered for any jobs that come through Career Services. When CSU’s Careerline system became Career Connections this semester, every résumé was lost.

Mitzi Vazquez-Long, director of talent development for Career Services, said the department plans to launch a campaign in conjunction with University Marketing to make students aware of the new Career Connections system and persuade them to upload their résumés to it.

Companies often come in to CSU looking to interview students but can’t find enough people to meet with them due to a lack of résumés.

“Our greatest challenge right now is in encouraging students to upload their résumés into the system,” she said. “We cannot help a student get placed if we don’t know who they are.”

Vazquez-Long said students searching for an internship can and should start with Career Services. The Career Connections system has over 1,000 positions at any given time and the department staff are trying as hard as they can to distribute internships — but no one is getting in line.

“I think some of it too is just that they don’t know that we’re here,” she said. “We have to do a stronger effort in marketing ourselves and our services.”

Even with lack of student involvement in Career Services, Meiksins said overall student criticism of CSU’s practical experience programs is valid and is being considered among the members of his committee.

The administration is working on revamping the program, but for now, Meiksins said the solution is under construction while his committee examines every aspect of the situation.

"'Problem' is a big word," he said. "I wouldn't call it a problem, but I think the university knows that there are some things to be sorted out with respect to internships."
'Almost, Maine' all about imagination
CSU workshop production created to give more acting opportunities

By Abe Kurp

The Cleveland State University Department of Theatre and Dance's Fall 2015 mainstage production "Ubu Roi" ended its exuberant two-week run Nov. 15. However, the department still had more quality theater to offer in the form of workshop-production "Almost, Maine," which finished its one-weekend run Saturday, Nov. 21 at the Middough Blackbox Studio in the Middough Arts Building.

The 2004 play by John Cariani about young couples in love in a fictional town features a series of disconnected scenes with two to three actors each. Highlights include "Getting it Back," a scene about a girl who shows up in the middle of the night to return all of the love her girlfriend gave her — in big red sacks — and "They Fell," which features two buddies who literally fall in love.

According to Lara Mielcarek, an assistant professor of Theatre and the production's director, the play resonates well with both the actors and the audience.

"I adore this play and yes, the characters and situations — even those that are a bit magical or unrealistic — are both relatable and magnificently endearing," she said. "Love is, after all, quite unexplainable and extraordinary."

The play was rendered in this production with a sparse set, limited props and no costumes — a far cry from CSU's no-holds-barred production of "Ubu Roi."

According to Mielcarek, the show's limited budget meant the actors really had a chance to shine.

"I enjoy the lack of 'stuff' in this production," she said. "No one is expecting it to be a spectacle with fancy set, lights, props or magical shenanigans. It is all about the acting and a little imagination — OK, a lot of imagination."

Mielcarek said the production became a reality after students pushed the department for more opportunities to act.

"There was a demand amongst the student body for more opportunity because of the incredible increase of majors within the department," Mielcarek said. "The mainstage shows couldn't possibly accommodate all of the incoming talent, and so a new concept was born. It was to be a workshop production."

By its nature, this workshop production is bare bones because of budget restrictions but still contains the key elements of any production, including a dedicated director and enthusiastic actors.

Mielcarek said the push to bring this concept of a workshop production to the CSU Theatre department was led by Lynn Deering, CSU's Dance Program director, and Holly Holsinger, associate professor of Theatre and the Head of acting.

"Lynn and Holly are definitely the key players in making this a reality," Mielcarek said. "But the entire faculty was helpful in creating it as a wonderful addition to the CSU 'season.'"

Mielcarek did not say whether theatergoers could expect a CSU workshop production every season, but the university's decision to invest in the theater program could mean this production is the first of many.

In any case, Mielcarek said she is pleased with this production of "Almost, Maine," particularly its cast of dedicated student actors.

"Their commitment and interest and unrelenting honesty within the work has been just fantastic," she said. "I am so proud of them, of this exploding department and [of] this brilliant opportunity given by a faculty that supports it all."
'Mockingjay Part 2' lacks depth, plotline

By Morgan Elswick

The "Hunger Games" movie franchise has finally come to an end with its last installment, "The Hunger Games: Mockingjay, Part 2," released Friday, Nov. 20, and I personally feel a little cheated.

The final part in the four-film series begins directly after the previous one ends. Katniss Everdeen (Jennifer Lawrence) is the Mockingjay, a symbol of hope to those rebelling against the Capitol.

Her close friend Peeta (Josh Hutcherson) has just been rescued from President Snow (Donald Sutherland). However, she soon discovers that he has been tortured and brainwashed to believe Katniss is the enemy.

With the help of her friends and fellow victors and the resources of Alma Coin (Julianne Moore) — the leader of District 13 — Katniss moves ahead with her plan to end the reign of President Snow.

After the movie, I wasn't sure quite how I felt, and I'm still not sure. A lot was cut in the transfer from book-to-movie, but what was included didn't really have an impact.

The action scenes were gorgeous — of course — and so were the costumes. The cast was great. The only lacking feature was the plot. It wasn't interesting.

It felt like the storyline was built around sporadic, drama-filled moments and explosions. Major character deaths came one after the other, which ruined the effect. The deaths were the same as in the book, but they lacked the same depth.

In the end, it became just another love story. Everything they went through — the Games, battles, deaths, losses — was wrapped up together and tied in a clean, little romantic end.

The ending is very much like the finale installment of the "Hunger Games" series, "Mockingjay, Part 2," fails to be anything more than a cheap imitation of the book.

The problems with "Spectre" were not as bad as I feared. The action scenes were beautiful and the cast was great. The story, however, was lacking.

The next Bond film will hopefully reinvigorate the franchise and bring something new to the table. Overall, it was unsatisfying. I wouldn't recommend skipping this film. I don't want to be that person, but the books were way better. They actually made sense, had some emotional, meaningful plot and meant more than one stupid love triangle.

Daniel Craig is back as James Bond in the new installment of the series, "Spectre."

By Roman Macharoni

It's safe to say the James Bond saga has had its ups and downs in quality. While certainly not the worst of the Bond films, "Spectre" — released Nov. 6 — comes across less as a labor of love by the filmmakers and more like a need to cash in on the latest resurgence of this iconic character.

James Bond (Daniel Craig) is back but not necessarily in the best mental shape. With the old M (Judi Dench) gone, the new M (Ralph Fiennes) is working hard to pick up the pieces of the espionage organization MI6.

When Bond grants the death wish of the old M, he unintentionally discovers the revival of terrorist group OCTOPUS, now renamed SPECTRE.

Cyberterrorist Blofeld (Christoph Waltz) — someone with mysterious ties to Bond’s past — not only plans to monitor the world by means of surveillance but also to destroy MI6 from within. It’s up to Bond, with the help of Q (Ben Whishaw) and Moneypenny (Naomie Harris), to stop this daunting threat.

Craig is as good as always in his portrayal of Bond, matching the same cool, calm demeanor of the character he’s become famous for. Waltz as a Bond villain steals the show.

The new Bond girl, Madeleine Swann (Lea Seydoux), is also a welcome addition to the cast. Even former pro wrestler Dave Bautista is great as the latest muscle to cause a thorn in Bond’s side.

The problems with "Spectre" lie deeper than its cast and special effects. While Waltz is a great asset to the movie, he was not given a lot to work with.

Additionally, the recurring theme of cyberterrorists threatening the world is getting a little cliché. While "Skyfall" managed to add some new elements to the series, "Spectre" favors nostalgic imagery to carry its primarily stagnate story.

Craig is arguably one of the better actors to play James Bond, but this latest foray just feels tedious — not particularly bad but just average. The next Bond film will hopefully bring something new to the table and reignite the passion that makes Bond such a timeless character.
Broadway star speaks to CSU students

'A Gentleman's Guide' actress discusses industry with Theatre classes

Kristen Beth Williams, a Broadway star, stopped by several CSU Theatre classes to share advice and experiences with students. Williams stars as Sibella Hallward in "A Gentleman's Guide to Love and Murder," a show that won the Tony Award for Best Musical in 2014.

By Giorgiana Lascu

With tickets provided by the Kulas Foundation, students from the Cleveland State University Department of Theatre and Dance traveled en masse to Playhouse Square Nov. 10 to watch a performance of "A Gentleman's Guide to Love and Murder" — winner of the Tony Award for Best Musical in 2014.

Little did they know that just a few days later, they'd be speaking to one of the show's stars. Kristen Beth Williams — Sibella Hallward in "A Gentleman's Guide to Love and Murder" — made an unexpected guest visit to CSU just two days later.

Dr. Lisa Bernd, adjunct professor of theater, was also seeing the musical that night with the students and recognized Williams as a former student of hers when she was teaching at the University of Oklahoma.

Bernd approached Williams after that evening's performance and invited her to the Department of Theatre and Dance while she was in town to speak to her students.

Williams, thrilled to see her former professor, was delighted to have a chance to give back to young theatre practitioners.

Daniel S. Rosokoff, the show's production stage manager, also visited the department where Rosokoff shared more than 20 years of experience working backstage at Broadway shows. He had been invited by Russ Borski, associate professor of theater.

Williams and Rosokoff covered a broad range of topics from the personal struggles of working on a touring show for a year, to the technical ins and outs of their show, to the changes in the industry of their respective fields.

Rosokoff mentioned the changes in his position he has experienced over the years.

"Hiring a stage manager is more of a director's game now," Rosokoff said.

The two also discussed their different approaches in getting Equity Cards — proof of membership in the Actors' Equity Association of the United States — and the experiences they went through to establish their two vastly different but equally stellar careers.

"I worked my butt off at Wichita Summer Stock the summer of my sophomore, junior and senior year [of college] and walked out of there with my Equity Card, ready to move to New York," Williams said.

Rosokoff got his card three years after getting his Bachelor's degree.

"I worked as a stage manager on smaller shows rather than as an assistant stage manager on bigger shows, because I didn't want a career as an assistant," he said.

Williams agreed with Rosokoff and talked about the importance of auditioning often because it made her more comfortable with the process.

"It's better to go into auditions with an attitude of, 'I'm probably not going to get this job, but I hear you're looking for an actor, maybe I can help you with that,'" she said.

The conversation became more personal as they started talking about the "A Gentleman's Guide" tour. Williams spoke about the rigors of doing the same show over and over in tour.

"When you're doing a show for so long there are bound to be some days where it's just a job and you tell yourself 'OK, I'm going to work. I've got to do this thing,'" she said. "Those days usually come in winter when you have a cold. I try to tell myself this is a new audience who's probably never seen the show before, and I have to give them my best. That helps."

She admitted that her biggest struggle — besides packing enough clothes and essentials for a year — is being away from her husband for long stretches.

"Facetime is my friend," Williams said.

After the Q&A, the two stuck around taking selfies and chatting with students individually. The two guests were quoted emphatically in every class discussion for the rest of the week.
I was recently explaining to my girlfriend that most video games follow "gaming logic" — they exist in a self-contained universe and actions taken only make sense within the confines of the game. Find some numbers scrawled on a wall? Must be the code to a nearby safe. Find a random item? It must be useful for something.

In "Fallout 4," Bethesda's Nov. 10 release, none of the typical gaming rules apply. The only rules that matter are those of the wasteland. Find a crashed UFO? A shopping mall run by robots? There's nothing significant about them — they're just part of "Fallout 4's" world.

A lot of games are labeled open-world now, but not many give the player as much freedom as "Fallout 4" does. There's nothing you absolutely should or should not do. Instead, the game simply places you into the environment to truly give you the sense of being a wandering explorer.

Although there are plenty of questlines, the true fun of the game comes from exploring the wasteland. Some of the best moments come from stumbling upon odd, creepy or funny locations and trying to put together the puzzle pieces of what happened.

You can do every quest or none of them. You can be a marauding bandit or help townspeople with domestic disputes. Whatever you choose, there's no reason to behave in any particular way — and that's what makes playing it so freeing.

There are an uncommon amount of glitches, but most of them are harmless and usually funny. The game has only crashed on me once. Other issues have been superficial. The new dialogue option is actually more restrictive and lacks the tongue-in-cheek humor fans have come to expect from the "Fallout" series.

"Fallout 4" may not be entirely groundbreaking, but it is still one of the most purely enjoyable gaming experiences next-generation consoles have to offer.
Cleveland State University feels the 'Bern'
Sanders campaign rally affirms positive outlook on candidate

By Roman Macharoni

Democratic presidential candidate Bernie Sanders visited Cleveland Nov. 16 for a rally at the Wolstein Center.

Downtown Cleveland was electric as anxious people of all ages stood in line — some even for hours — to see Sanders in person.

As thousands of attendees piled in, the Wolstein Center quickly became alive with the chants and cheers of loyal supporters of the unorthodox, yet genuine candidate.

The Cleveland media definitely welcomed Sanders with open arms. They talked about the rally on all the major news stations. His appearance in the Student Center courtyard caused an explosion on social media.

I, for one, was excited to see Bernie Sanders. I have seen the Democratic debates, and I hoped that by seeing him, I would have my questions on his policies answered.

I also wanted some aspects of his campaign clarified.

In the few appearances I’ve seen, Sanders has not had a lot of chances to talk about the details of his beliefs and political stances. I’d like to think that was the reason a lot of the attendees came.

I can safely say I found a lot of clarity during his speech. He spoke intelligently on the correlation between our prison system and minority unemployment, as well as the need for a new structuring of the wage gap for a stronger middle-class.

Sanders also attested to his own form of family values. I had not heard much about Sanders’ family, as he does not choose to publicly discuss his family life, for which I commend him.

Sanders stated his rather large family — four children and seven grandchildren — is founded on family values, and that his Republican colleagues tend to confuse family values with their own agendas for the family unit.

It’s clear Sander’s authenticity and unique presence captivated the audience, and he has the support of several groups of low and mid-income level workers. Unions, retired men and women, teachers, entry-level professionals and college students took up a majority of the audience.

His no-nonsense attitude and progressive ideals rang true to many who attended. Sanders made his message clear to the audience when he asked everyone to join a “political revolution.”

Though he still trails Hillary Clinton in the race for the 2016 Democratic Party nomination, the journey of his campaign has been nothing shy of inspiring.

Sanders certainly is the underdog of this race — he has battled every step of the way.

There’s a long way to go in his campaign, but in his short time on the road — and in Cleveland last week — he has proven himself in my eyes to be a legitimate, formidable candidate — someone who may very well be our next president.

Roman Macharoni is a junior Communication major at CSU.

Black Friday: an American contradiction

Don't participate in a greedy, unnecessary shopping spree

By Elisabeth Weems

In a few days, swarms of customers will flock like blind sheep to department stores for the grotesque affair that is Black Friday.

Usually the color black denotes negativity, but to the mindless consumer, Black Friday is the happiest day of the year.

Hours after concluding family dinner and sharing moments of gratitude, participants in this sad event strip themselves of dignity and camp outside Wal-Mart for doorbusters.

This year, Wal-Mart will open its doors at 6 p.m. on Thanksgiving Day. This will both extend the life of Black Friday and force underpaid workers to pull all-nighters to shepherd eager shoppers.

Despite the message of materialism people are sending to the coming generation, mothers and fathers around the country have created a new family tradition of consumption, which happens to fall the same day they give appreciation for what they already have.

Too many consumers have the chance to buy more electronics made with conflict minerals from Africa, which are assembled in Asian sweatshops.

For the betterment of humanity at large, Black Friday should be protested.

It reinforces the notion that our lives must be dictated by the dollar, and accumulating more goods we do not need is the ultimate goal.

The most distressing aspect of Black Friday is the complete redefining of the holiday season to promote gluttony and materialism.

Thanksgiving is now only a prerequisite to purchasing material goods for Christmas.

Holidays like Valentine’s Day, Halloween and Easter have all lost sentimental value and have been reduced to markers on our calendars for insatiable consumption.

This concept of saving money by buying products at a reduced price is also contradictory.

These goods — including brand-name clothes and high-tech electronics — are not life necessities.

Capitalism has succeeded in instilling the idea in consumers’ minds that luxuries are necessities.

If we are to rise up against societal structures that oppress us, we must come to understand Black Friday creates an illusion of happiness.

Those who are truly satisfied with their lives do not blindly herd to Macy’s for artificial price reductions on the same night they share gratitude for their preexisting wealth.

One paradigm shift we must undergo is realizing wealth is not only measured by income and assets but by true happiness money can’t buy.

In years past, people have been trampled and killed by other obsessive consumers — climbing over one another for cheap PlayStations.

Do not participate in Black Friday shopping this year because it means conforming to an unjust, capitalist system, which reduces human beings to complacent, greedy consumers.

Elisabeth Weems is a junior Journalism & Promotional Communication major at CSU.
Conference Services needs to step up
Student organizations struggle to book space at CSU
By Gregory Kula

Starting a student organization is a very difficult task. You have to go through hoops for the actual creation, and then you have to somehow recruit people to join.

Along with these difficulties, we need to put on events throughout the school year — especially when you have a theater club like I do.

I founded my club based around live performances throughout the year, and almost everyone at Cleveland State University has been helpful — except Conference Services.

Having one problem with a department would be understandable, but it seems the only way Conference Services does anything is if you call and yell. This is not how a college should be running and honestly, it seems like a simple Excel spreadsheet and some thinking would fix their problems.

I ran into my first issue last year when they opened the door to the auditorium an hour late the day of our show.

Then, this year, they booked an event in the theater at the same time and same day I had the theater reserved — again, on the day of the show.

They attempted to fix the problem this year by sending someone to help us set up, but the person did not show up on time. I had to call and "sternly talk" to Conference Services again until they sent someone.

Trying to put on a show is hard enough, even without having to find out the day of that your setup time — booked three months in advance — was cut short.

Along with not being cooperative with room reservations, the majority of the staff doesn’t know how to use the equipment in the rooms. And why wouldn’t you include fresh batteries when someone rents microphones?

I understand there are a lot of events on campus every day, but requesting rooms by trying to look at their calendar is impossible. It’s divided by times and if there is a way to search rooms, I haven’t found it in four years.

And why should a request I filled out with an employee of Conference Services be rejected because they can’t tell the difference between a time and a date?

The incompetence of the department is astounding. If anything in the real world was run like this department, they would be replaced faster than you can say "unprofessional."

Just make an Excel sheet for each room with times that can be booked online — that’s my suggestion to end all of their conflicts.

The actual business world relies on efficiency, communication, and sticking to schedules. Conference Services must not know this because I’ve seen a lack in all three.

So before you decide to have an event on campus, make sure you check in with Conference Services multiple times.

Also, don’t be afraid to call them and say something like "Get someone here now. I don’t care if you’re busy," and hang up.

Chances are they aren’t busy, because they showed up within two minutes after the call.

Gregory Kula is a senior Political Science and Economics double major at CSU and Sports editor for The Cauldron.

Why are we only praying for Paris?
Acknowledging all man-made, hate-produced deaths in the world
By Regan Reeck

I have grown up in a world saturated with violence. Every day headlines are soaked in blood and shrouded in human misery.

I rarely do anything more than flinch at the depiction of a massacre, and perhaps allow my thoughts to be troubled by the atrocious things we do to each other.

Yet the recent terrorist attacks have incited more than brief anger.

Out of all the problems we face in this world, the origin of most of them is ourselves. Out of all the evils, our passivity and tolerance for them is the most horrific.

In Paris on Nov. 13, 130 people were killed and 352 were injured.

What the world has chosen to ignore is the 43 who died in Beirut the day before, the 19 lives lost in Baghdad, two who died in West Bank the same night and 102 people who have died since.

We pray for Paris. We send our thoughts and condolences with this department is astounding. If anything in the real world was run like this department, they would Prayers don’t bring the dead back and lately, don’t do anything but show our obliviousness to all the other hate-produced deaths in the world.

A statement made by the Dalai Lama reiterates the solution plainly, “Humans have created this problem, and now we are asking God to solve it.”

If we truly want this ugliness to stop, we need to make it stop. Proclaiming our deepest sympathies through prayer to the dead and injured of Paris displays our indifference toward the undeserved deaths and denial of a man-made problem we need to fix.

Regan Reeck is a sophomore French and Journalism double major at CSU.
GET THE CAULDRON DELIVERED STRAIGHT TO YOUR INBOX

Visit www.csucauldron.com/mailing to sign up for our brand new mailing list. Beginning this year, we’ve embraced the future and half of our issues are available online only. Make sure you never miss an issue (online or print!) when The Cauldron comes straight to you every Tuesday.

www.csucauldron.com/mailinglist

FOLLOW THE CAULDRON ON SOCIAL MEDIA!

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>csucauldron.com</th>
<th>/thecauldroncsu</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>@csucauldron</td>
<td>@csucauldron</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>