2017

Revolution '67

Marylou and Jerome Bongiorno
Bongiorno Productions

How does access to this work benefit you? Let us know!
Follow this and additional works at: https://engagedscholarship.csuohio.edu/jtb
Part of the African American Studies Commons, Film Production Commons, Oral History Commons, Social History Commons, and the United States History Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://engagedscholarship.csuohio.edu/jtb/vol5/iss1/9

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by the Michael Schwartz Library at EngagedScholarship@CSU. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Journal of Traditions & Beliefs by an authorized editor of EngagedScholarship@CSU. For more information, please contact library.es@csuohio.edu.
An Essay on the Documentary Film Revolution ’67

Marylou and Jerome Bongiorno, Filmmakers*

We live in Newark, New Jersey. And it’s a city — like so many other American cities — that’s suffering.

Most people associate Newark with its airport or its violent history. They especially remember the Newark riots of 1967, during which 26 people died, hundreds were injured, and the city endured millions of dollars in property damage. People assume that it was this one event that left the city in a state from which it has never fully recovered.

We started researching Newark’s past for our short thesis film at NYU’s Graduate Film School. The film, 1967, was fictional, an interracial love story set during that hot, turbulent summer in Newark. With Spike Lee as a teacher/mentor and later as an executive producer, we sought to write a longer, more substantial screenplay and needed to ask lots of questions. We also wanted to record the answers. This work became Revolution ’67, the documentary film.

Our first interviews with eyewitnesses Amiri Baraka (who in 1967 was known as LeRoi Jones), former Students for a Democratic Society (SDS) president Tom Hayden (who had lived in Newark from 1964 to 1968), and historians Ken Jackson and Clement Price brought many surprises. The most startling was the myth of the Black sniper. According to newspaper articles of the time, and even today, most of the riot’s casualties were said to have been caused by Black snipers from the Newark community. This was information that we dramatized in our NYU thesis film. But our interviewees presented evidence that Black snipers didn’t exist and that most of the killings were committed by law enforcement: Newark Police, New Jersey State Police, and the National Guard.

Another revelation was that the riots were a rebellion against deplorable conditions stemming not from a single day, or from months or years, but from decades of corruption and neglect. This led us to a reexamination of how slavery, the economic motives of the Civil War, Jim Crow laws, unscrupulous real estate and banking practices, the civil rights era, the Vietnam War and the veracity (or lack thereof) of media coverage factored into Newark’s revolution of ’67. As Newark’s history unfolded, so did America’s.

Tom Hayden states in our film: “To recover, you have to know what happened.” Forty years later, after numerous Newark officials have been indicted and/or imprisoned, and the vital signs of the city are still poor: a high poverty rate of 25 percent, the eighth highest murder rate in the nation, 9.5 percent unemployment, and 22 percent high school graduation rate. We recognize that Newark is still suffering and must learn from its past. The greatest lesson of the 1960s is that the people must empower themselves in order for that change to occur.

*Filmmakers Marylou and Jerome Bongiorno prepared this essay in 2007, and the nation marked the 40th anniversary of the Newark, New Jersey riots. It is reprinted here with the authors’ permission.

If you would like to view clips from the documentary film, please visit: https://vimeo.com/81735536.
For information on how to obtain a free copy of the companion curriculum guide, please visit:

For more information on their company, Bongiorno Productions, please visit: