ERRATA

Helping the Uninsured: Health Insurance in Ohio and in the Nation
Randall R. Bovbjerg

The Journal of Law and Health regrets that several errors appear in Volume 4, Issue 2. First, the issue as printed omitted the text for page 126 that begins the discussion of Table 1. The omitted text appears below. For ease of reference, Table 1 is reproduced as well.

Second, the issue gave the estimated price tag of the Pepper Commission’s reform proposals as $6.6 billion, on page 145, before note 117. The correct figure is $66 billion, as in note 113 on page 145.

Please permanently attach this errata sheet to Volume 4, Issue 2. The editors and staff of the Journal apologize for any inconvenience this has caused.

Table 1: Competing Views of Rights in Health Care

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Right to health</th>
<th>Right to health care</th>
<th>Right to equal floor of medical access</th>
<th>Right of equal opportunity to buy access</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Broadest view of all: equal outcomes for all, large public role</td>
<td>Massachusetts view: equal access to care for all, including very high-tech care</td>
<td>President’s Commission view: public guarantees adequate access of care for all, subsidizing needy as necessary</td>
<td>People “earn” health coverage, like other goods, little public role</td>
</tr>

At the far left is the “right to health,” as exemplified by the World Health Organization. This view holds that everyone by virtue of being human has a right to health. By "health" is meant the fullest well-being achievable — physical, mental, and social. This end of the spectrum emphasizes equality of outcome, full health for all. The state has a corresponding responsibility to fund the requisite medical care. To my knowledge, however, no society has implemented such a broad standard except perhaps as an ideal to be strived for.

At the far right of the Table lies a much narrower right -- equality of opportunity to work for health benefits, with little or no public reallocation of resources. Real rather than rhetorical American policy lies almost at this extreme. Under this view, health coverage depends on work status: Workers and their dependants are expected to get workplace coverage designed by their employers and unions, but with public tax subsidy.
