FOREWORD

The launching of this publication is the culmination of a two year commitment to an idea: the development of a forum for the vigorous discussion and debate of the legal and moral issues arising when law and medicine intersect. These issues are increasing in frequency and complex in character; they raise unparalleled ethical questions. Only the prolonged and searching analysis of academicians, practitioners and policy-makers will begin to answer these questions. The Journal of Law and Health is the arena in which this medical-legal dialogue can be carried out.

Toward this goal, the Journal contains writing from all the fields which offer a perspective on the legal and ethical aspects of medicine and health. Although scholarly in format, the Journal includes feature articles, commentary, research, book reviews and surveys of recent legislative and judicial developments. The result is a comprehensive publication presenting both traditional and innovative thought.

No publication can come to fruition without the vision and dedications of many. In the case of the Journal of Law and Health, the founding work was that of James E. Powell and Karen E. Rubin. It was their idea that gave the Journal life and their efforts as fourth-year law students that made it a reality. Generous financial support was given by the Treu-Mart Fund and the Robert S. Stein Foundation, Supporting Organizations of The Jewish Community Federation of Cleveland and The Cleveland Foundation. Others who lent aid, advice and support include: Frank J. Weaver, Director, Division of Public Affairs, The Cleveland Clinic Foundation; Mark B. Schildhouse, Director, Marketing Services, The Center for Health Affairs of the Greater Cleveland Hospital Association; Jan E. Murray, Associate Dean, Cleveland-Marshall College of Law; Louise P. Dempsey, Director of Development, Cleveland-Marshall College of Law; Professor Sheldon Gelman, the Journal's faculty advisor; Professor Joel J. Finer; Professor Robert J. Nissenbaum, Director of the Joseph J. Bartunek III Law Library, Cleveland-Marshall College of Law; Barbara Sper, Assistant to the Dean, Cleveland-Marshall College of Law; A. Gayle Girdler, Officer Manager, Cleveland-Marshall College of Law.

The Journal of Law and Health is designed to play an important role in facilitating the medical-legal dialogue which is emerging today, and which will take on increasing importance in the future.
