 Medicare and Medicaid law concerns the federal government's health insurance program for elderly and disabled persons and persons with end-stage renal disease, as well as the federal and state government's health insurance programs for persons receiving public assistance. Topics include government health care appropriations; government trust funds; government payroll taxes; health care cost measurement and cost-effectiveness; health care insurance; health care networks; inpatient hospital, skilled nursing facility, home health agency, home health aide, hospice care, and other medical services coverage and payments; as well as prescription drug and biologicals coverage and payments. Medicare and Medicaid law research also provides particularly rich opportunities for understanding legislative and administrative law.
